As our National heroes, while time shall last.

COMPANY I

The Company was organized in Burlington, Iowa, after the first call for troops in 1861, and went into camp (Fair Grounds) early in July and on the 18th of July was mustered into the United States service as Company I, Sixth Iowa Infantry.

As we assembled in the line for muster,

In the makeup, the company was cosmopolitan,

They were born in many different Union States

And one was from the Isle of Man,

There were Irish patriots from the Shannon River,

Galway and the Killarney lakes as well,

Sprightly Swiss from the white snow capped Alps,

Crags and peaks—the haunts of William Tell.

There were Austrians, dwellers along the Blue Danube,

Germans from Bingen, yes, Bingen on the Rhine

And Swedes from Stockholm, on the Baltic Sea,

Others from the north—beyond the Arctic line,

England too, gave us some valiant warlike sons

As ever slept beneath the gentle falling dew,

And Scotland's highland lads were as brave

As the "Thin Red Line" that fought at Waterloo.

There were those who fought in other wars:

Swartz was in the great army in Europe

That fought the French at Magenta and Solferino,

While Merrill with the Regulars on the plains

Had skirmished with the Indians—Apache and Navajho,

Turner at Sebastopol heard the guns at Inkerman

Wadsworth played our National airs at Vera Cruz,

Brydolf fought with Taylor along the Rio Grande.

BROTHERS IN THE COMPANY

The Antrobus boys were brothers, also the Bradley boys; Fleming had a brother in the 25th Iowa and another in a Rebel Alabama regiment. Charles was my playmate and schoolmate in boyhood, bunkmate during my service and was killed in a skirmish after the Battle of Bentonville, and after the surrender of the Rebel Army; the two Harpinian boys were brothers; David and John Key were brothers; their father and another brother were in a Rebel Texas regiment and were captured at Vicksburg; the three Lowery boys were brothers and each received a severe wound. Linton had a brother in Company K, who was killed at the Battle of Peach Tree Creek.

RELIGION IN THE ARMY

A great number of the boys were not affiliated with any church and perhaps had no preference. Silversmith and Jericho were Jews. Jericho was wounded and later, killed; Silversmith was wounded. Conroy and Eicholtz were Catholics. Conroy was timid and deserted. Eicholtz always prayed during violent thunder storms, and when going into battle, would pray and cross himself vigorously, after which

"He was there when the scrap begun,
And was there when the scrap was done."

Pratt was a Methodist and was killed at Missionary Ridge. His father, chaplain of a regiment, was killed at Helena, Ark, a few months before. Jackson was a Methodist, a cannon ball beheaded him at Griswoldville. Philbrook was a Universalist—a believer in the salvation of all mankind. He was among the slain at Shiloh. Clark was an Atheist—a disbeliever in the existence of a God, devil heaven, hell or a rational life beyond the grave, and the writer has always entertained similar views. Clark went to eternity at Shiloh when the shower of death struck the regiment on the fateful April 6th.

ILLITERACY AND EDUCATION

There was no illiteracy in the Company. Every member could do the stunt of "readin, writin and rithmetic." They had all attended school two or three months a year and most of them in one of the early National civilizers—the log school house. High Schools and Colleges were unknown to them. But they were all familiar with firearms and could shoot with unerring and deadly effect.

TEMPERANCE AND THE DRINK HABIT

Whiskey drinking among soldiers was common, though not always to the extent of being drunkards. Whiskey was furnished at times as daily rations. The writer and Tobias Ulrich were the only total abstainers in the company and the writer is still standing in the same thin line. One of the worst drunks in the company is still living and frisky at the good old age of seventy-nine.

MARRIED MEN

This was a company of boys with only a few married men. Brydolf, Jackson and Perkins were the only married men in the company. But you ought to have heard the wedding bells the year following the close of the war!

COWARDICE IN TIME OF BATTLE

There were some cowards in the company, more common among officers than in the ranks, and whiskey was a great factor in that line. At Jackson, Miss., July 14, Lieutenant Smiley was in command of the company and had been drinking and singing lively until the battle opened when he called for Sgt. Sutherland to take "command as he was completely potered out." Sutherland was killed a few minutes later and Smiley was dismissed and never appeared with the company again. At the Battle of New Hope Church, May 28th, 1864, the writer with H. B. Linton were occupying an advanced picket post, and curiosity led me some distance in front of the picket line until I came in full view of the Rebel fortifications. While watching thus I noticed a large force of men jump over their works and form in line. I knew what it meant, and yelled at the top of my voice for the boys "to run for their lives as the whole Rebel army was coming." I discharged my rifle at the advancing foe when I too, lit out with fleeting footsteps for our lines. When I arrived I found ever available inch of space in the hastily constructed breastworks occupied by lying, kneeling and standing troopers with guns pointing forward. It would have been folly and death to remain on the outside and by walking on the shoulders and bodies of the lying troopers I effected a crossing to the rear. I thus became an involuntary spectator instead of a participant. There were three or four others standing on the bank with me. We did not have to wait only a few moments when the Rebel force emerged from the underbrush and with terrific yell, jumped on a six gun battery, (1st Iowa) some fifty feet in front of the regiment, and while both sides were pulling at the cannons the infantry support consisting of the 6th Iowa, 46th Ohio, 100 Indiana and the 103d Illinois opened fire with deadly effect. At this juncture I heard a loud voice (not from heaven) shouting, "Run, Captain Clune, you damn cowardly son of bitch." Turning to the rear I saw Captain Clune disappear in the woods, and the voice came from Norval W. McKay, who was standing by my side. The battle was soon over when Captain Clune returned and shaking his fist at McKay's face, said; "McKay, those were harsh words you used to me." And the intrepid McKay replied; "They were, and they were true." This ended the controversy. McKay, later, was appointed Sergeant and Clune was promoted to Lieut. Colonel of the Regiment. McKay resides at Wapello, Iowa. Clune is dead. He died of yellow fever at Galveston, Texas, two years after the war. His Farewell Address to the regiment at the close of the war is a master piece of that period. It has but few equals and no superiors, except perhaps, Van Dorn's address before the Court Martial at Holly Springs, Miss.

ALL ACCOUNTED FOR AT WAR CLOSE

KINDLY GAVE A BLACK DIAMOND RATTLER A BITE

After the capture of Jackson, Mississippi, the army returned to Vicksburg for a short rest. Started on the return trip July 23d and marched mainly after night and rested during the day so as to avoid the dust and heat. On the 24th we camped near Queen Hill, after a tedious night march of fourteen miles, and the company was detailed and sent out on picket duty a mile north of the regular camp. George Jolly, Merritt Jamison and myself were left at a certain point in an open woods for duty. We immediately began operations for cooking some green corn for breakfast. Not far from our post was a pile of poles, some fifteen feet long, evidently intended for fencing. We appropriated them for fuel and soon had a good fire and water boiling. While this was going on Jamison, who had gone a short distance from us shouted: "Come quick with a club, here's the biggest rattle snake you ever saw!" I was on my feet in a moment and scanning the ground for something useful for that purpose, my eyes turned to the fire when I noticed that some of the poles had burned in two in the middle. I grabbed one of these and ran to the rescue. I had no trouble in locating Mr. Rattler. He was in plain sight and was working his rattle box vigorously. My first impulse was to hit him a whack and kill him immediately, but just than my good nature prevailed on me to give him a show for his life, and knowing how dearly the rattler loved to bite, I concluded to gratify his desire. With that object in view I began moving the red hot fire brand toward him, which seemed to delight him from the manner he worked his rattle end, and when the pole had reached the proper place, according to his idea, he sprang and hit the red hot fire brand with terrific force. I expect he bit hard, but he did not bite long, and the next moment he seemed to have forgotten that he had a rattle box, and was beating the ground with both ends and performing more jimmasticks in a minute than a High School boy could do in a life time. I offered it to him for a second bite, but he was too busy with his own sad self to notice the tempter. I than hit him a rap and mashed his head. He was five feet long, of the black diamond species, and a beauty—if a rattle snake can be called a thing of beauty.

W. P. KRENIER

Five feet ten inches high. Weight 175 pounds. Born near Wilkesbarre, Pennsylvania, March 16, 1841. But—

I was reared along the Mississippi River,
Where its water was deep and wide
And I sported in the virgin forests
That lined its bank on either side,
As I look backward on my childhood,
No brighter spot on earth I know,
Than the pathless forests along the river
As I saw them sixty years ago.

COMPANY DOG JEFF

On our return from Springfield, Mo., in November 1861, our drummer boy astonished the company one night when going into camp by pulling an ugly looking brindle pup from his haversack. The pup was about six weeks old and the boy named him Jeff Davis, in contempt, rather than admiration of that individual. The boy carried the pup in his haversack, 100 miles, to Sedalia, where we went into winter quarters. The pup was always playful, eat anything in the food line set before him. In March when the regiment went to Tennessee, Jeff went with us and was with us in the Battle of Shiloh. The next summer he showed his usefulness and willingness to help the boys catch a hog or chicken whenever called upon. He was with us in the Battles of Big Black River and Jackson, and in the assault on Missionary Ridge he ran, barking, in front of the colors and on reaching the fortifications, with a fearless bound he landed on top of the works and fell dead at the same instant. That night, after the battle, the writer got his body and had it buried in the trench beside the boys killed that day.

SINGERS IN THE COMPANY

There were number of good singers in the company. Merrill could entertain the regiment all night long with his comic songs. Charles Shipman had an endless variety of Negro Melodies which he could render in a charming manner. John Isett was one of the world's sweet singers. He arranged the tune and sang for the first time "When Sherman Marched down to the Sea." At that time Isett was in a Rebel prison and the guards were so well pleased with the song that they called him out several times to repeat.

GENERALS IN THE ARMY

As soldiers we had opportunities to see Generals and study them at close range. And those observations became a conviction, not a prejudice through life. The writer has ever regarded Halleck as the master military spirit of the age. His short campaign before Corinth taught all our generals that if they only moved a few rods to fortify and hold it. In open field battles, it afterward became an important factor. Grant seemed fond of show and displaying his horsemanship by riding a horse as fast as he could go when reviewing troops or going through camp. One could not see Fremont but to admire him; he was a gem plucked from the halls of enchantment. Thomas was always grand, Pope was superb and McPherson was magnificent. But the most striking figure in the army, was, perhaps, John A. Logan. With black hair hanging around his shoulders and a mustache near a foot long, made an impression not easily forgotten. The writer in his life time recalls seeing no one more striking attractive in appearance, except (Wild) Bill Hickock, the hero of the plains. The writer saw Blair, Sherman, Lew Wallace, Hooker, Sheridan, Custer and Kit Carson who was the grandson of the great Daniel Boone, and the first white man to lead an expedition across the pathless Rocky Mountains.

The three men from Burlington who became Generals, the writer knew before the war. Fitz-Henry Warren and Jacob Lauman were Nature's Noblemen. Whenever they met the Sixth Iowa they would dismount in front of Company I, take off their hats and shake hands with every member of the company. No one in the Burlington company was beneath their notice. Corse was an arrogant snob.

BATTLES ENGAGED IN

1987743

The Sixth Iowa left Burlington on August 3, for the seat of war and on August 5, we lined up for battle at Athens, Missouri, to help repel a Rebel force that was threatening the invasion of Iowa. We then went to St. Louis and during the fall took part in the campaign in Southwest Missouri. In March 1862 we joined the army at Pittsburg Landing, on the Tennessee. On April 6th and 7th we participated in the battle there, better known as the Battle of Shiloh. The regiment had 65 killed and 217 wounded (See names of the killed on another page.) The battle was one of the fiercest known in the history of wars. We buried over 1,000 dead Rebels on the battle field, which was a thousand more than they had killed during the Chickahominy Campaign, and 1,500 more than they had killed at Gettysburg.

We took part in the Big Black River engagement and lead the assault on the Rebel works at Jackson, Miss. We also lead the assaults at Missionary Ridge, Big Shanty and Kennesaw Mountain, and the writer points with pride to the fact he and a comrade in Company E, were the only Union soldiers to reach the field works and returned unharmed at Kennesaw Mountain.

At the Battle of Peach Tree Creek the regiment lost heavily; during the entire Atlanta Campaign, it rarely missed a day without being under fire. In the March to the Sea, it engaged a force of ten times its number at Griswoldville, and held them in check until the rest of the Brigade came in from a two mile run to their relief. It was present at the capture of Savannah; the march through the Carolinas, participated in the Battles of Averashborough and Bentonville, and in Washington in the final or "Grand Review," at which time it bore on its flag the inscription, "100 DAYS IN BATTLE."

OLDEST SURVIVOR NOW LIVING

Is Captain Washington Galland of Montrose, Iowa. He is now rounding out the last decade of his century. He is known as the first white child born in the territory now comprising the State of Iowa. He was a lad when the first steamboat ascended the Mississippi River. He saw the Mormons under Joseph Smith land on the opposite side of the river and build a great city and a magnificent Temple. The Mormons are gone and the Temple, long ago lit up the surrounding country with the light of its destruction.

THE AUTHOR OF THIS BOOKLET

Was a soldier during the war period and carried a Springfield rifle, and is proud to say that he is not a descendent of any king, queen, or other sprig of monarchical nobility. His ancestors were good German people, who landed in Philadelphia, from the ship Palatines, October 10, 1749. My grandfather was born December 6, 1773. One of his uncles perished of hardship at Valley Forge, and another was killed at the Battle of Germantown and a third one was in the Indian troubles that culminated in the historic "Massacre of Wyoming."

After the war the writer crossed the continent, and had several skirmishes with the Indians who were on the war path in 1866, 1867 and 1868, and returned via Panama to New York. In 1873, with Edward H. Thomas, a master printer, we started the Nauvoo, Illinois Independent, which is now conducted by GEORGE BAUMER & BRO. George was with us and helped on the first issue, and under his careful management it has flourished ever since like a "Green Bay Tree." While conducting that paper the writer published the first article ever printed on the subject of using the falls as a great water power. The project will be finished in 1913 after an expenditure of $20,000,000, and forty years delay.

In historic Nauvoo the writer remembers seeing the great Mormon Temple in 1847. It was destroyed by fire October 8 and 9, 1848. He also is pleased to state that he has dined at the table set by Mrs. Emma Bidamon, who was the only wife of Joseph Smith, the founder of the Mormon religion; that he knew Judge Sharp who was tried for leading the mob that broke into the jail and killed Joseph and Hyrum Smith, two unarmed prisoners.

KIND FRIENDS AND READERS

My task is nearly done. The most of my comrades have passed to the great divide. Those living have passed the mountain summit and are descending with rapid footsteps toward the setting sun of eternity. A few more years and the brave boys of 1861 will rest in their silent graves and history; and now—

Hark! I hear the bugles sounding,
Calling the aged and tottering into line,
For their last great earthly rally,
Before plunging into the wilderness of time.
And even now I see the gathering,
On the banks of the unknown stream
Quietly wailing the approaching darkness,
And the last ray of the sun-light's gleam,
While our footstps are unsteady,
And our hair is snowy white
Let us approach the grim destroyer,
Cheering, with smiles and faces bright.
Soon with others we will assemble
On the banks of the darkened shore,
Father, mother, sisters and departed comrades
With the countless millions gone before.
